

Effective Use of Personal Branding and Networking

Skills and Professional Development

Banner artwork by BRO.vector / Shutterstock.com

In the first two parts of this three-part series on Interpersonal Influence at Work, James Bellerjeau and Abigail Tan discussed the importance of personal branding and networking.

Now in the final installment of this three-part series, Bellerjeau and Tan come together to share their experience and observation of how people have activated their networks using their personal branding.

Importance of social media

Tan: We have all seen the effect of the economic downturn that happened last year resulting in reductions in force particularly in the tech industry. My LinkedIn feed was overwhelmed with post after post of people reaching out to their network. Colleagues were saying they are open to work and trying all ways and means to find a job after they have been laid off. Was yours the same, James?

Bellerjeau: Most definitely. People are more transparently tapping their networks to ask for job opportunities, recommendations, or even just a comment to expand the reach of their LinkedIn posts.

Tan: Apart from involuntary separation, I have had people within my network who reached out asking for referrals due to voluntary separation or simply to climb the ladder.

Bellerjeau: As have I, and I would then assess whether I would want to actually refer this individual. We cannot refer everyone who reaches out to us, and we shouldn't either because our reputation is also at stake. If I do not know the individual well on a personal or professional level, I will look at their LinkedIn profile to figure out who they are and that is where their personal branding comes into play.

Others are always looking, so it is imperative to maintain a good image on social media and uphold a positive reputation. Aniwwhite / Shutterstock.com

We cannot refer everyone who reaches out to us, and we shouldn't either because our reputation is also at stake.

Quality profile pictures are extremely important for your personal brand. Ka Han / Shutterstock.com

It is important for individuals to maintain their personal brand and presence. (This also applies internally within the company as fellow colleagues could also be a good source of referrals if need be.) It is also essential to have a profile picture. What do you look out for?

Tan: I would definitely look at their personal brand to determine if they would be a good fit for an opening (if I am aware of one). I would also look at their connections — I am generally wary of profiles with fewer than 500 connections.

I am also cautious if a LinkedIn profile is largely empty and has little activity as it would be hard for me to gauge the kind of person they are and to determine whether they would be a good fit for the relevant opening. I'm sure that headhunters and hiring managers are looking at these factors when assessing a potential candidate's profile.

In-person interaction

Bellerjeau: Exactly. I would add that personal connections are super important. Over decades of work, I have met many people in person, including at ACC events, and I keep a running list of who might be interested. Hence, it is important to attend in-person networking events because contacts can't pass on your name if they don't know you're on the market.

Tan: Yes, and these in-person interactions are also a good source of information for us to ask for law firm recommendations and have substantive legal discourse. I met a contact at a networking event who was looking to start a business in a neighboring country.

In-person networking events connect people from all over and increases potential business possibilities. loaurielaki / Shutterstock.com

As we were talking, I realized that he had not thought of certain data privacy issues so I recommended that he might want to speak to a data privacy expert in this neighboring country and I linked him up with the law firm after the event. And I knew of the data privacy expert because of a speaking engagement that I had attended previously. This shows the importance of personal branding and networking, connecting people together across different geographical lines.

Bellerjeau: That sounds simple enough, yet most people fail to recognize how many ways attending professional events can help luck to find you. It certainly increases the chances that you'll be someone that people think of when opportunities, be they job openings or potential business opportunities, come up.

But, of course, it is important to do this authentically and to ensure that it is a genuine connection and not simply a transactional relationship because there is a dark side to this.

Tan: I couldn't have said it better myself. When you are only looking at "taking," the relationship becomes imbalanced. Instead, we should always ask ourselves — "How can I be of value to my network?"

Perhaps we could be super connectors, case in point of how I had connected a data privacy expert with a networking contact. It could be as simple as passing an opportunity along.

It is important to do this authentically and to ensure that it is a genuine connection and not simply a transactional relationship because there is a dark side to this.

Sharing knowledge and creativity

I also use networking sessions to share knowledge, i.e., I would like to know what the key legal trends in the tech industry are and how are legal teams growing in their efficiency, e.g., using legal operations to accelerate contract management.

Bellerjeau: It is also a good way for leaders to find out what is on employees' minds by speaking to others in similar roles so that we can be better people managers. Informal settings are perfect for finding out what are the career aspirations of the younger generation and how would that fit into the current company's business model.

Companies can use such opportunities to be genuinely interested in employees' development. Likewise, it would be good for the junior staff to use networking opportunities to better understand what senior management is looking for, and the difficulties faced by senior management so that they can try to find ways to plug the gap.

Networking opportunities can pave ways for senior management to share knowledgeable information with junior staff. shmai / Shutterstock.com

Tan: I also believe in speaking to people from different walks of life as it encourages creative thinking and helps lawyers develop more creative solutions to current business difficulties. After all, in-house counsel can do so much more than just advising on the law. We are here to partner with the business.

Bellerjeau: To sum up, it behooves lawyers at every stage of their careers to understand how to maintain and broadly reach out to their network, depending on personal and professional circumstances.

It behooves lawyers at every stage of their careers to understand how to maintain and broadly reach out to their network.

This can be for job openings (be it reduction in force, voluntary separation, climbing the ladder), business opportunities, understanding employees' motivations, and for employees to better understand senior management.

Tan: And to always do so in an authentic fashion.

We hope that you will be able to utilize this three-part series on Interpersonal Influence at Work, particularly in this digital age. Reach out to the authors with questions, comments, or if you just want to network!

Join ACC

Disclaimer: The information in any resource in this website should not be construed as legal advice or as a legal opinion on specific facts, and should not be considered representing the views of its authors, its sponsors, and/or ACC. These resources are not intended as a definitive statement on the subject addressed. Rather, they are intended to serve as a tool providing practical guidance and references for the busy in-house practitioner and other readers.

James Bellerjeau

Lecturer

University of Zurich

James Bellerjeau is a lecturer in the LLM program of the University of Zürich and for the Europa Institut of the University of Zürich.

Bellerjeau served for two decades as group general counsel for Mettler-Toledo International Inc., an S&P 500 company with its worldwide headquarters in Greifensee, Switzerland. He then led Mettler-Toledo's global Sustainability program for several years through June 2021.

Bellerjeau shares thoughts on how to live a good life at Klugne. You can also follow him on LinkedIn.

Abigail Tan

Commercial Counsel, APJ

Elastic NV

Abigail Tan is commercial counsel, APJ, for Elastic NV. She is based in Singapore.