5:00 am

Brain: On, no alarm needed. Like clockwork, I'm up and moving. No easing into the day here — I head straight to the computer, check my inbox to see what's already brewing overnight, and scribble out my to-do list. Before diving into actual work, I take a moment to survey my office kingdom. Is today the day for a grand "desk reordering?" Maybe ... but the emails start calling, so I get moving.

7:00 am

Time to switch from attorney mode to home operations manager. Dishwasher loaded, pool filter checked, trash taken out, laundry started, and a quick spot check of the first floor. Fuel comes in the form of Zipfizz — no coffee. Then it's prep mode for the kids, ages one and three.

7:30 am

The toddler tornado and baby potato are roused from their slumber. Breakfast is an event: waffles, smoothies, pouches, watermelon, grapes, pancakes. Tornado eats none of it. Potato eats everything in sight.

8:15 am

---

The Queen arrives to whisk the tornado off to school. I savor two seconds — literally — of sweet, sweet silence before grabbing my bag and heading out.

8:30 am

The commute is my non-work conversation window. I call a friend to talk about anything that isn't contracts, risk clauses, or indemnities.

9:00 am

First stop: the office phone booth for a meeting with the legal team about a big consulting deal on the horizon. We talk RFP instructions, who's taking which redlines, upcoming business meetings, and how to manage expectations before they spiral out of control.

9:30 am

Back to my double desk setup with dual monitors ... except I've forgotten my adapter back in the phone booth. Retrieve it, plug in, and — of course — the monitors don't cooperate. A few rounds of "turn it off and on again" later, victory is mine. Technology, you fickle friend.

10:00 am

Solutioning call with the deal team. My role here is to listen, absorb, and advise when needed — but mostly let the business folks shape the vision.

11:00 am

Time to engage international stakeholders. I internally marvel (and mildly panic) at how many people it takes to get a single proposal to approval. Unlimited resources are amazing ... until you realize they also come with unlimited opinions.

11:30 am

Meeting with internal clients about a termination notice from one of our current clients. We cover termination assistance, rights to hire our employees, and mitigation options. I mentally prep the emails and Slack messages that will need to go out to manage the fires.

11:30 am (yes, again)

Different meeting, same big deal. I join halfway through — an external advisor is giving input on how to approach this first-of-its-kind opportunity. I appreciate the perspectives, even as the list of stakeholders grows longer.

12:30 pm

Lunch with the local legal team. Down to the cafeteria for a buffalo chicken wrap that somehow defies the laws of spinach wrap physics. Back upstairs to trade stories about house projects, the NC State

---

Fair, upcoming vacations, and whose kids staged bedtime door-banging protests (spoiler: it's always mine).

1:00 pm

Contract redlining time. I weigh each change against company legal positions: unlimited liability? No way. Infringement indemnification? Sure. Double-dipping warranties? Absolutely not. Strike, unstrike, strike again, but less — measured risk is the name of the game.

2:00 pm

The redlines are interrupted by a corporate business development meeting on the deal. More risks to review, more approvals to target, more gaps to close. My mind wanders briefly to what life must be like in a small company, then refocus.

2:30 pm

Early escape to avoid traffic. One road; home, super simple. I call my friend again for our afternoon check-in. The Jeep is loud, but he doesn't care — he's barely listening anyway. I vent about the million people I had to (oops, got to) talk to today.

3:30 pm

Vacation backup planning with a colleague. I'm headed to Italy for two weeks — Florence, Venice, Rome — with a big group of 20. Lots of coordination to make sure clients are covered while I'm gone.

4:00 pm

Schedule a meeting with the lead client partner to review legal issues in the contracts. Attendance is spotty, which I note for future escalations.

4:30 pm

Tech demo for the legal department. Thirty minutes later, no meaningful solution. Fingers crossed the next call brings more promise.

4:48 pm

Toddler tornado breaches the office door. I quickly assess whether I'm on camera before deciding whether to redirect or ride out the storm.

5:00 pm

"Work is done, Dadda," declares The Queen via text.

5:02 pm

---

Full family invasion. Time to wrap up.

5:15 pm

Dinner planning: mac and cheese (yes), chicken nuggets (only if stolen from the tornado), HelloFresh vs. takeout. Takeout wins.

6:00 pm

Race to the bath: baby potato vs. toddler tornado. The psychology always works — tornado takes the win.

6:15 pm

Towels, bedtime stories, and the nightly “which kid do you want?” debate. The answer is always the same. I’ll take the easy one.

6:30 pm

Kids down, cleanup done, couch claimed. Attempt invisibility. Fail — The Queen sees all.

7:00 pm

Soccer. Will I score and earn another captain’s star? Only time will tell.

8:00 pm

Drive home, quick check of Slack and email for deal chatter.

8:25 pm

HBO Max wind down. Ballers, Entourage — the usual comfort viewing suspects.

9:25 pm

Sudden realization: 9:30pm deal checkpoint with the global team. Hop on Teams (no video, of course).

10:00 pm

Another meeting on the deal. More perspectives to soak in.

10:30 pm

Video games. Brain off.

1:00 am

Sleep.
